Beyond Covid-19 and Disaster Capitalism: Why We Need Sustainable, Secure Left Tech Infrastructure for Social Justice Movements

by Jeremy Saunders, Co-Executive Director of VOCAL-NY and Board Chair of Progressive Technology Project, and Alice Aguilar, Executive Director of Progressive Technology Project

Covid-19 has exposed the failures of our health, economic, and emergency response systems. Our priorities now are to take care of ourselves and one another, creating communities of care. Front-line movement groups are organizing to respond to the immediate needs of their communities, while struggling to move much of their on-the-ground organizing work online. And once again, as we've learned from the history of disaster capitalism, corporations are taking advantage of our need for online engagement and profiting while we "shelter-in-place." Corporations are marketing their online tools—such as Zoom—to our movements under the guise of 'helping', when instead they are wreaking havoc on our data security and privacy as we've seen from "zoom-bombing" and as they sell our personal information to third party vendors. The move to online is also exposing a serious lack of tech infrastructure, and more importantly, lack of access to the internet, which our communities need to stay connected. We may soon witness communities that will "disappear" (and we may not know it) as their voices are repressed because of this lack of access.
